America, & Europe, have moved massively to the Right. It's hard to see this for many of us, who seem so far removed from the Overton Window that any shift is negligible. Regardless, it's happened. You can look through TikTok & see edits about Hitler or other taboo figures. White chicks can say the nigger word & get 100k followers overnight instead of being forced to apologize & self immolate.

The "Dissident Right" of today is virtually indistinguishable from the AltRight of 2015. In many cases, we've actually moved past the AltRight. Less whining about optics & more just telling the Left to "shut the fuck up". Bear in mind that the modern dissident right isn't a fringe group that acts as a punching bag for media outlets, it's a collection of hugely popular accounts & activists that are followed by actual policymakers, to include the Vice President of the United States.

In all reality, we have made huge amounts of progress in the last 10 years due to a variety of political issues, leaders, & activists. The old guard conservatives, like Mike Pence, are essentially anathema. They hardly exist anymore & no one listens to them. In 2016, Trump was the most radical politician to even have a shot at the presidency in decades. Now, he's basically the bare minimum to even be considered mildly conservative.

People can have their reservations about groups like Patriot Front or Blood Tribe, I have some myself. Personally, if you haven't engaged in real world activism I don't really care. Regardless, it should be noted that groups like these being seen marching in the streets is something hasn't been seen since Rockwell's American Nazi Party in the 60's. Before them, the closest thing was the 2nd generation Ku Klux Klan. Although groups like the Aryan Nations & Stormfront carried the torch throughout the meantime, these people weren't marching through the streets of major cities. They were hidden away in the mountains of Idaho or something.

Much has changed since Charlottesville, meaning the zeitgeist now allows these groups to march in the open. Lefty media can't even drum up a big fear mongering campaign about it anymore. There's also been a consolidation in racial voting patterns. Doing very rough math, because precise data isn't available, the huge majority of Whites under 35 leaned right in the recent election. The Gen Z vote for Trump almost perfectly aligns with the demographics of the generation, more or less.

This is good news, a huge issue in the past is that Whites were split while lefties could use coloreds to tilt the scale. Having Whites begin to consolidate politically will be absolutely vital as Gen Z will likely be the last White majority generation. Although the concept of a White minority in America is depressing, it should be noted that Whites would still be the most numerous ethnic group by far. This isn't as bad as Rhodesia or South Africa, where Whites were only a small fraction of the population at any point.

Another optimistic trend, that I see mentioned far too rarely, is that the decline in fertility rates isn't just affecting Whites & Asians. It just hit us first. Globally, the bipedal rat populations (China & India) are also dropping well below replacement level. India should go under this year. In America, all major ethnic groups have below replacement fertility rates. Blacks & Hispanics are actually dropping much faster, whereas the White fertility rate has remained roughly stable.

Fun fact, some heavily industrialized regions in China have fertility rates as low as 0.6. The highest in the country is 1.97. The final solution to the chink problem may be self solving.

It seems that the mysterious factors that led to our declining fertility rates have hit brownoids like a truck, globally. It should also be noted that a huge factor in the relatively high Latinx fertility rate is recent immigrants. Third worlders have a bunch a kids they can't afford, shocker. Later generation Latinx have much lower fertility rates. According to ICE, border crossings are down about 95%. That means virtually no one is getting across, because it's a waste of time now that they know they'll just be sent home & will likely soon lose all government funding.

This decline in global fertility is good because it severely limits how many immigrants can realistically get imported to America or Europe. For the longest time, immigration was 'justified' by the creeping population decline in the West. Given that capitalism relies on constant growth, and even more so do current Social Security type institutions, a declining population is bound to cause problems. This is also true for third world countries, who are going to be far more hesitant to even let migrants leave to begin with. It doesn't solve the problem, but it certainly staves off many nightmare scenarios of endless migration.

I should also point out that the seeming universality of the population decline is going to cause a very different economic system to takeover. I don't think we're going to fully abandon the concept of capitalism, but it will certainly have to adapt to a shrinking population instead of consistent growth. Measures taken to bump up fertility don't work, not in Hungary today or Rome 2000 years ago. At this point, it must be considered that it's an emergent phenomenon, a fully natural process for some reason or another.

What this all means is that the demographic crisis is slowing down, massively. Back in 2016, it truly felt like we were the last generation of Whites while all the browns had 15 kids off a welfare check. Turns out we just had to wait because they're even more consumerist than we thought. Unfortunately, the Evangelicals' rabid desire to ban abortion in the blackest states may add a hiccup in this trend, but I think Blacks as a whole have learned how to not have 5 kids from random niggas.

So, where does that leave us? Well, we can calm down worrying about the demographic shift as much. Not that the situation is good, but it's looking like the numbers are going to roughly crystallize around where they are with Gen Z. That means about 45-50% White, which sucks but still makes us the dominant demographic by far. Looking at the increasingly Rightward shift of White America, as well as a greater level of radicalization than has ever been seen in modern politics, we are in a relatively good position.

Which leads me to the radicalization point. Obviously, take this with a grain of salt because it's entirely unquantifiable. I hope previous articles on the subject have shown my expertise (read: autistic special interest) on the matter to lend credence to my words. Things like the Boogaloo movement matter, as do the developments of subcultures like Atomwaffen Division/Terrorgram & the recent flux of lefties calling for violence for their "EelsTaNCe." These things don't just happen randomly, without cause & effect. That isn't to say the Boogaloo movement wasn't a bunch of cringy LARPers, just that it was an important development in the realm of US politics.

You see, the entire premise of the Boogaloo movement, what most of the memes were about, was violent confrontations with the federal government. It was, & kinda still is, common to see merchandise, artwork, and other media directly or indirectly supporting the killing of federal agents. This just goes to show how unconvil the political landscape has become, as well as how unpopular the US government is with the populations that don't rely on welfare. The thing many people don't realize is that every joke has a kernel of truth, & every meme betrays a deeper worldview. This is important when you look at a large scale movement that dominated the entire tactical & firearms communities, plus a significant portion of RW discourse.

Hell, you can just look at some of the people they idolize. Randy Weaver, the Branch Davidians, Kildozzer, the Bundy family. These used to be bloody stains on American history, these people were just seen as random crazies. Now, they're immortalized in semi-ironic patches & hyped up video essays. Even the gunmen from the North Hollywood Shootout have been lionized to an extent, showing the core desire to just go to war with the system.

Popular RW influencers are often a bit out of touch with the general public. Not to the extent of some faggot BuzzFeed reporter or MSNBC host, but still, they live a different lifestyle than the average guy. When I close Substack, I'm still just a guy. Either another nameless grunt in the war machine or some hitch helping his family on the farm. I assume the vast majority of my readership is the same, just students & workers of some stripe. This means we're more in tune with the rest of the normal guys, the guys that are either normal conservatives or apolitical with implicitly RW worldviews/personalities. Things changed heavily under the Biden administration, as well as the riots & pandemic of 2020.

You can see this even in popular culture, with one really bad country song & one really good country song which both topped the charts. The first is 'Try That In A Small Town' by Jason Aldean. This song sucks, Aldean sucks. Regardless, the song is still an implicit threat of violence written in the wake of the BLM riots. The first verse is obviously about Blacks, even if not stated directly & probably not even fully understood by the old man himself. The second verse is aimed towards a hypothetical gun grab by the government. The second song was 'Rich Men North of Richmond'. This one was a big sensation when it came out, & I still hear it often. This song perfectly encapsulates the 'apolitical' RW of America. The common folk that don't write articles or clog my Twitter feed. I doubt I even need to describe this one, you've most likely heard it & if you haven't, listen to it. That's our recruiting base, the silent majority.

Another topic I wanted to mention, because it's often brought up by retards to demoralize you. The gender gap in politics hardly exists. The demographics of 2024 voters show that, like it always has been, politics are divided far more by race than gender. White men & women voted almost identically, most analyses show about a 7% gap, which is negligible. Furthermore, White women have actually moved considerably to the Right, at a slightly faster pace than men. The last election was actually a much closer gap for Whites than was present historically. The bulk of the gender gap came from the Latinx vote.

It should also be noted that this defied leftist expectations, they thought they firmly held the female vote. I think the misconception that so many women are leftist comes from two major events in the last few years. The first was the #MeToo movement. While we remember all the retarded shit that came out of it, at the time most women saw it as a vehicle for legitimate concerns about sexual harassment & such.

The other was the reignition of the abortion debate after SCOTUS struck down Roe v Wade. Unfortunately for my Christian readers, abortion is a losing topic in national politics. I understand the importance of the issue to Christians, but most people are either fine with it or simply don't care. If you talk to women (who overwhelmingly support abortion to some degree) you can see that most of these women aren't demented whores. In fact, the vast majority of them would never actually get one, even in the event of an oopsie baby out of wedlock. People often bring up that the majority of abortions are out of convenience, & that situations of rape or incest are incredibly rare. This is true.

However, these people also forget how the female mind works. Many women support abortion due to a borderline neurotic fear of being raped, including fully respectable women that don't sleep around at all. It's pretty easy for a married woman in Oklahoma to rally against abortion, she's in basically no danger. The same story isn't true for women in racially diverse states or cities. This threat is very real, & these women have a strong fear of being forced to carry some nigger's bastard child because she was victimized one night. When you look at it from that angle, their support for abortion becomes easier to understand, even if you disagree on principle.

I've written before about how the overturning of RvW was a tactical & strategic mistake from the GOP. As I said, it's an unpopular issue & it directly cost us the 2022 midterms, making the Biden presidency even worse. It could also potentially lead to higher birth rates in the Black population, which is concentrated in states with strict abortion laws. Regardless, this issue wasn't nearly as important as DNC strategists thought it would be. Virtually all states that restricted abortion made caveats that protected instances of rape & such. Meaning women were more or less fine with it, & didn't care once the Handmaiden's Tale fear mongering campaign ended.

I have no explanation for the massive gender gap in the recent German elections. Nothing like it happened in France, RN had about equal numbers of men & women voters. I already brought up the US elections. Either something weird is going on in Germany, or AfD just sucks at targeting women voters. You'd think convincing German women to be against migrants would be easier than convincing a pitbull to bite a child.

The point being, don't buy into retards telling you that your own women are the enemy. It's demoralizing nonsense, your primary adversary will always be the alien races in our country. Blacks, Jews, the usual suspects. As a side note, women generally don't feel strongly about things like politics. It's not in their nature. If you want a woman to stop leaning left, just make her fall in love with you. Evola speaks of this, as does MedGold. 90% of women don't care about politics by the way, it's simply not in the realm of things the female mind is concerned with. True misogynists would actually know this.

People like to make fun of the conservative "LGB without the T" policy, as they should. But something important is that this is the first time in recent history that LGBT rights have been pushed back. Occasionally, conservatives have tried to dig in & stop the spread, but they've refused to actually push back. Actions like legally delegitimizing the very idea of transgender people is a massive shift, throwing LGBT issues back 10 years. Add on to this that support for LGBT issues is at its lowest in years, especially among the youth, and we could be seeing the beginning of the end for the 'gay agenda.' Fags have been winning consistently since Stonewall, this the first time they've been actively pushed back & could easily signal a turning point if we keep up the pressure (& they keep being the most annoying people in the world).

So, what's the point of this article? It certainly isn't to downplay the seriousness of our struggle, we are still under assault by a variety of enemies on all sides. Rather, this is an attempt to ease your fears. Especially people who are newer to the movement, whi didn't see just how hopeless the situation seemed from 2013 to 2021. This is the first time any element of the Right has made noticeable progress in decades. It's important to note that nothing happens overnight, & things like this are far bigger than the individuals that take part in them. The Right is in a position starkly similar to the position the Left was in during the years preceding the Civil Rights Movement, Counterculture, & all the other nightmare events that occurred during the 1960's. We all see today what that snowballed into, & there's no telling what will happen 60 years from today.

The main takeaway from this is to not buy into demoralization & blackpill slop. It's pushed on purpose, by our enemies. Best case, it's pushed by some deforlist faggot that wants to drag you down to his level. Crabs in a bucket, misery loves company, you know the drill. It's like listening to marriage advice from a gay on his 5th divorce. Never stop fighting, to the bitter end.

Fortunately, this also gives us more freedom to "punch right." This means exiling problematic currents in the broader RW, purifying the ideological gene pool. Zionists, third worldists, neoconservatives, former leftists that feel that "woke went too far." These currents may have been temporarily useful in stemming the tide of leftism, but we can reliably cut them off to their own devices now. As time goes on, we can even cut ties with the Peter Thiel types & leave behind MAGA as much as we left behind the old guard GOP. It all depends on how well we keep up the fight.

I shouldn't make it seem like the Left is dead in the water. They are at their weakest in decades, & the massive infrastructure of NGOs, non-profits, government programs, & others that advanced their cause ('The Cathedral') has been dragged into the light. Not only that, but they're being systematically defunded in the US. That being said, they still have a considerable amount of influence & maintain the benefit of monolithic ideology. They also benefit from stereotypically "RW" organizations supporting their goals, like many Christian organizations (most notably the Catholics) supporting migration or neocons/civnavts like James Lindsay turning their sights on the new RW.

These Ben Shapiro or James Lindsay type conservatives are the primary target for exile, and must be pushed into obscurity in order to progress further right, especially in regards to racial consciousness. No quarter.

It's also a perfect time to get organized. The vast intelligence apparatus that spent years harassing RW organizations have been thoroughly defanged by the new administration. Fortunately, the same tactics used against Atomwaffen Division or Patriot Front were also used against more moderate conservative groups, earning the ire of Trump & Co. This means the COINTELPRO subversion & surveillance programs aren't running, and the DoJ isn't interested in what they're finding. It's now far easier to organize, or simply join a group like Patriot Front, NSC-131, or your local Active Club. It's not easy to tell, but the gorilla activism they do is actually effective. Seeing a "White Power" sticker on a lamp post shows people who may be sympathetic to our ideals that there's others out there. Hell, even Blood Tribe gets supportive horn honks & waves when they demonstrate, & they're the most non optics friendly group around.

In the book The Hard Reset, from the Terrorgram presence, there's a thousand quote. "For every accelerationist with an internet presence, there's a thousand more shrouded in untraceable anonymity." This is true, for all groups. Content creators are rare, whether it be published authors or random Twitter users. The vast majority of people are lurkers, they consume but do not put themselves out there. Most don't even bother to like or comment, they simply observe. There are millions that are at least latently sympathetic to our ideals. Even people who have never come across any of our content but are still predisposed to our worldview, roughly. I've met many people who otherwise aren't into politics & don't use social media beyond normal Instagram & TikTok feeds.

These are people who are quietly racist, don't believe the holocaust was real, and other things that they can't bring up because it's socially unacceptable. As these taboos break down, these people become more common for you to notice. They're like sleeper agents, just waiting for the Overton window to push right & the right leadership to take over in the real world, rather than shady corners of the internet.

This is easier for me to say. I come from a deeply Southern area where rap music is usually referred to as "Coon Tunes." I've heard plenty of people my whole life say something to the effect of "I'm not racist but we should've sent the niggers back to Africa." Ah, the infamous "I'm not racist, but..." For those of us in areas where Lefty indoctrination is rampant, whether it be a college campus or you have the misfortune of living in Seattle or something, I feel for you. You're in the belly of the beast, but that's all the more reason to get active & fight the good fight. Somewhere out there, there's a normal person who needs to see you marching down the street, or see your logo stuck on to light post. Our enemies have a well structured apparatus built to demoralize us, it's up to you to counteract them.

Moreover, don't forget the golden rule. No one is coming, it's up to us.
